RECIPE OF THE WEEK

Picnic Pasta Salad

- 1 lb rotini pasta
- 1 English cucumber
- 2 bell peppers
- 10 oz grape tomatoes
- 1/2 red onion
- 2 tbsp fresh chopped parsley
- 1/4 cup crumbled feta cheese
- 1 bottle (16 oz) Italian dressing
- 1/4 tsp salt
- 1/4 tsp freshly cracked black pepper

Cook pasta according to package instructions. Drain in colander and rinse with cool water; drain well.

Slice cucumber into half-moons, chop bell peppers, halve tomatoes, thinly slice red onion and chop parsley. Set vegetables and parsley aside. Transfer drained pasta to large bowl. Add chopped vegetables, parsley and feta cheese.

Pour dressing over pasta salad and toss until evenly coated. Add salt and pepper then refrigerate until ready to eat.

EARTH TALK

From the Editors of E/The Environmental Magazine

Are we already noticing significant biodiversity shifts or losses as a result of climate change in recent decades?

- J.D., Lovland, NY

Climate change is not the only reason we have suffered huge biodiversity losses in recent years, but it has played a part in the shifts and declines of species that many ecosystems have faced. Other human activity like habitat destruction, overexploitation of resources, and invasive species introduction have also had an impact. But climate change has become a more

The Great Barrier Reef, which is especially vulnerable to rising temperatures, has already suffered biodiversity losses from climate change. The northern parts of the reef—often regarded as one of the most biodiverse habitats on the planet—have changed in the last three decades, with many fish going extinct. The reef depends on its diversity of coral to attract a wide variety of fish, but higher ocean temperatures have killed many types of coral already in a process called bleaching. “Bleaching is a stress response by coral, which have tiny microscope algae inside their tissue,” said Coral scientist Terry Hughes in a TED Talk. “Those algae give the coral its color and they are important for the nutrition of the coral. When bleaching occurs, the algae are depleted and the coral itself becomes nutritionally compromised.”

On land, some animals have been driven north or to higher altitudes to escape the heat. As a result, plant species left behind have fewer animals to disperse their seeds and sustain their native habitats. Climate change has also thrown off species’ seasonal clocks, which help them time their behaviors with the cyclical nature of the seasons. “Since every organism’s seasonal clock is affected differently by different phenological cues, such as precipitation, temperature or sunlight, it’s very difficult to predict how each organism is going to respond to climate change,” said botanist and ecologist Liana May in an educational YouTube video by Nature Change. Because of their differing cues, some flowers may bloom before their pollinators come out of hibernation and birds may migrate at the wrong time.

Scientists have identified the links between climate change and biodiversity loss, and recognize that addressing one will help the other, and vice versa. Specifically, reducing the effects of climate change allows for the restoration of natural habitats and the reintroduction of native species, and preventing biodiversity loss can keep natural habitats healthier and more capable of absorbing carbon emissions. Focusing on both biodiversity loss and climate change together may be the key to saving thousands of species, and to keeping our natural habitats healthy.

It was effortless working with Patti. From the start she took care of all the things that google mentions and the ones that it does not. From the house photos, to open houses, managing offers, dealings with the buyer, the attorneys, insights into showcasing the house, advising and assisting on fixing things that'd make a difference, she was on top of things and made it look effortless.

All in all, she was amazing and have nothing but gratitude in our hearts for hand holding us during such big change in our lives.

We had a great experience with Patti as our agent. Patti was a great help, she has a ton of experience and knows how to drive a sale to completion! She responds quickly and listens to the customer, but gives her own insights and advice from her wealth of experience. She has decades of experience in the New Hyde Park area. She was great to work with, we appreciate all her help and expertise!
